The Stack & The Method

THE STACK

The four tools I actually use. That's it. Not 50 "must-have" tools. Four.

- 1. The Brain — Claude or GPT-4o. Writing, ideas, code, analysis. Pick one, learn it deeply. Both work. Switching constantly is a tax most beginners pay without realizing.
- 2. The Visuals — Higgsfield. Covers, ads, social images, short video. One subscription replaces a freelancer for everything you'll need in your first six months.
- 3. The Audience — Kit (formerly ConvertKit). The only place your audience lives that you actually own. Email list, sequences, tagging — all in one. → https://convertkit.com?lmref=your_ref
- 4. The Checkout — Gumroad or Stripe. Take payment in 15 minutes. You don't need a store. You need a way to be paid.

That's the entire stack. If a tool isn't in this list, you don't need it yet.

THE METHOD

Step 1 — Pick the one thing to sell.

Not "what could I build." Pick ONE thing. A short book. A checklist. A Notion template. A 30-minute consult. Specific enough to name in one sentence. If you can't say it in one sentence, you don't have an offer yet — you have an idea.

Step 2 — Use the stack to build it. Today.

The Brain writes it. The Visuals dress it. Kit holds the audience. Gumroad takes the money. The whole thing should take an afternoon, not a quarter. Polish is what you do after someone pays.

Step 3 — Put it in front of 10 humans.

Not a thousand. Ten. Friends, your email list, one community you actually belong to. Watch what happens. Track who buys, who doesn't, who asks questions. Real signal beats imagined demand every single time.

THAT'S IT.

The trap most people fall into: they think they need to learn more before they start. Wrong. You need a system that moves while you learn. The stack moves you. The method directs you. Everything else is decoration you add after the thing works.

Run it.

P.S. Tomorrow's email is about the place 90% of people get stuck. It's not where you'd expect.
