Seven Suspects, One Alibi

When seven strangers share the perfect alibi, someone is lying.

CHAPTER ONE - The Confession That Wasn't

Detective Sarah Morrison had been at the precinct for nineteen hours when the seventh suspect walked in claiming to have been at the gala the night Marcus Kline died. Same restaurant. Same time. Same impossibly precise detail about the centerpiece - three white peonies, one drooping slightly to the left.

She closed her notebook.

Seven people. One alibi. Each delivered with the casual confidence of someone reading from a script they thought they'd written themselves.

The interrogation room smelled like burnt coffee and the kind of fluorescent light that made everyone look guilty. Morrison studied the man across from her - Henry Voss, fifty-four, real estate attorney, no priors. He'd just delivered the same alibi as the previous six. Word for word. Drooping peony and all.

"Mr. Voss," she said. "When you went home that night, what did you do first?"

He didn't blink. "I poured myself a Scotch. Macallan 18. Two fingers."

The previous six had said the same.
