The Memory Thief

When memories themselves become currency, who owns yours?

CHAPTER ONE - The Empty Penthouse

The body in the penthouse had no fingerprints, no wallet, no phone - and, according to the medical examiner, no memories.

Detective Sara Chen had seen a lot in fifteen years on the homicide desk. People killed for money, for love, for the wrong word said too loudly at the wrong cocktail party. But she'd never seen a body emptied.

"The neurology is impossible," the examiner said. "The synapses are intact. The pathways are there. But there's nothing in them. Like a hard drive that's been wiped."

Sara stared at the dead man.

Memory wasn't supposed to be a thing you could steal.
